

Julie brightens people's lives

Because her employer sees her strengths and knows how to make the most of them, Julie, who has a serious mental illness, blooms as a florist.

LITTLE THINGS BIG RESULTS

No matter what your role in society, you can do little things to increase the social participation of people with disabilities. That way, you can help make our society a richer, more inclusive one.

You are a student?	Invite a classmate who has a disability to share some time with you during the morning or afternoon breaks.
You are a parent?	Suggest that your child invite a classmate with a disability to your home to play.
You work in a daycare centre?	Be positive about the addition of children with disabilities to your group and the planning of inclusive activities allowing them to participate.
You are a municipality employee?	When putting together any project (intersection, playground, festivities, community centre, recreational activities, etc.), think inclusive : will people with disabilities be able to participate like everyone else?
