

Adayel discovers reading

Because his childcare centre made some adaptations, Adayel, who has a severe motor impairment, is learning while playing with children his own age.

THINGS THAT MAKE A BIG DIFFERENCE

No matter your role in society, you can do something to increase the social participation of people with disabilities. That way, you'll help make our society more inclusive.

Do you work in a childcare centre?	Plan inclusive activities that enable all children to play together at the same time. Introduce activities to raise awareness. This can be done by reading or telling stories in order to talk about differences with the children.
Do you introduce children to sports or cultural activities?	Make young people with disabilities a part of your group and give them the opportunity to develop their potential to the best of their ability. Take your cue from the achievements of À part entière award winners (www.ophq.gouv.qc.ca/prixape).
Do you manage a library?	Think about making it easier for people with disabilities to access your services. Install push buttons so that doors open automatically. Consider training your staff who work at the counter to interact with people with different kinds of disabilities. Arrange the reading corner so that people in wheelchairs can use it.
Do you work at a school?	Ask your school team to mark the Semaine québécoise des personnes handicapées by carrying out awareness activities. Use our awareness tools at www.ophq.gouv.qc.ca/reussiteeducative to help children with disabilities succeed in school.
